Abstract

Humiliation has historically functioned as a strategic instrument of power in conflict, with gendered, sexualized, and racialized forms serving as particularly effective means of degrading both external adversaries and internal dissenters. As such, humiliation plays a critical role in the consolidation of domination. The experience of coloniality, in its various configurations, is intrinsically linked to processes of humiliation. The systematic dehumanization of colonized populations not only enforces their subjugation but also renders them perpetually vulnerable to acts of humiliation. This talk explores contemporary manifestations of humiliation as a colonial practice, with specific reference to three case studies: the genocide in Palestine, border enforcement regimes, and the US-led sanctions imposed on Iran. The focus is not on what humiliation is, but what it does: how it legitimizes domination, mobilizes populist revanchism, and sustains structural violence.
